February 10th, 2011, President
Barack Obama hosted a White House meeting in order to discuss the increase of heroin abuse in America, as the problem was becoming a major threat to public health. The meeting was led by heads of the federal and state government, together with local officials, representatives of private and non-profit community organizations, and addiction professionals. President Obama responded with a plan that would include “strengthening the treatment system, ensuring that addicts don’t use drugs when they’re in prison, or even while they’re on parole, providing prescription drug-monitoring programs and expanding access to recovery programs.” ((1) While the plan was welcomed, including by the American Medical Association, many critics of Obama’s plan asked, “Why addictions?” and

“Isn’t this a government responsibility?” In addition, these critics argued that Obama’s plan did not address the real issue: “What about legal and illegal marijuana?” The journalist and author Robert Greenwald discussed Obama’s meeting with the NYT: “The addiction medicine community has to deal with the fact that there’s a huge stigma attached to addicts.” Drug abuse is not a disease that only the poor endure, but rather a public health concern. In America, a nation that has “flourished” in the post-war era, drug abuse is a major concern to everyone in society. In 2011, the number of young people in the United States who were using illegal drugs rose from an estimated 7.6 percent in 2009 to an estimated 12.5 percent in 2011. This figure compares to a national prevalence rate of “just” 9.1 percent in 2008.
