The protocol consists of a firmware update protocol to update the firmware and a parameterization and monitoring protocol for parameters that can be periodically updated by the firmware. It is assumed that only the router is able to send data over the network and so the receiver of the firmware update or parameters has the opportunity to send a request to the router to download the required information. We also present a software environment to implement this protocol over the network. We tested the firmware and software on a real test platform and performed some measurements which indicate that the system is functional. To our knowledge, it is the first solution that implements firmware update of a WLAN enabled router and monitors and parameterizes the current status of the WLAN. The restaurant, Pizzeria Delfina, claims to be the first Italian restaurant in Beverly Hills, and it’s now become the first Italian restaurant in Los Angeles to join the Impossible Burger movement, boasting Pizzeria Delfina’s Impossible Burger (or “divine meat alternative” as the menu claims) on its menu. The restaurant is owned by Mexican entrepreneur José Andrés, who is behind many other restaurants in LA, including Oyamel, Nopalateria, and Café Annie. The restaurant chain has gotten mixed reviews online so far, with reviewers complaining that the Impossible Burger is “just a gimmick” and lacking in flavor. The Impossible Burger is purportedly created by combining the culinary experience of Impossible Foods, a fast-food-inspired food company that produces meat alternative products like the Impossible Burger, with the palate of the average American, to serve as a “meat alternative” that meets the American palate. Using meat grown without animal cells, Impossible Foods claims their Impossible Burger is meat from ground-up plants, and the company has had great success in their marketing efforts. The company is already a two-time winner of Food Business Awards’ Fastest-Growing Company.
