Blog Share Is Malaysia Turning The Corner? (A Malaysian company is making a strong case for becoming the next Apple) We have been hearing a lot about the Malaysian government not being able to get a grip on the protests over the past few days, and there has been all sorts of speculation over the reasons for the country's slow movement to a resolution. I'm afraid, at this point, we don't have a definitive answer, but I do have some new information to share with you. Taking a look at Malaysia's economic data, the facts are pretty grim. Gross Domestic Product (GDP) growth has been in the negative for the last few months, and is expected to stay there for the remainder of the year, at least until the government scraps the ongoing fuel subsidy cuts. But on a different note, thanks to the recent flood of tourists flooding into Malaysia (particularly during the peak holiday season), there has been a surge in tourists spending in Malaysia, with airfares being cut by up to 40% and accommodation price as well. However, just like the economic data, there have been some pretty positive signs for Malaysia, as the Tourism
