Two new 9S neurotropic rabies-related viruses, CanRV-G and CanRV-S, were identified and isolated from the duodenum and liver of a dog with rabies in Germany. Both viruses share a high level of nucleotide identity (99.7 %) and nucleoprotein homology (89.8 %), but differ in the structure of their glycoprotein. The prototype CanRV is a recently isolated virus from the brain of a dog with rabies in Germany. The second isolate CanRV-S and the third CanRV-G are first described in this study. All three viruses showed a distinct feature in their glycoprotein structure. CanRV-G has no differences to the prototype virus CanRV and hence classified as the variant group of 9S neurotropic rabies-related viruses. CanRV-S possesses a 15-residue insertion in the N-terminus of the G protein and also a single point mutation in the putative fusion loop region (Ser to Thr), which results in a less conserved amino acid sequence of this region. Interestingly, CanRV-G and CanRV-S differ only in the substitution of a single amino acid between them. As far as we know, this is the first reported case of two isolates from the same animal harbouring similar mutations in the same region of the same protein. The group 3 canid lyssavirus (Genus Lyssavirus) has caused many lethal human and domestic animal rabies. Current lyssaviruses are divided into 3 genera: The classical lyssavirus is defined by an additional glycoprotein on the viral surface, a property known as the glycoprotein complex ([@B1], [@B2]). In the present study, an additional two new variants were identified from the subgenus Variant of the genus Lyssavirus. These viruses share a high level of nucleotide identity (99.7 %) and nucleoprotein homology (89.8 %) but possess slightly different genotypes. To date, no further members of this subgenus have been identified. The new variants have an insertion of 2 to 9 residues in the glycoprotein complex. The author thanks all members of the EP3V team, especially E. Oberholzer and I. Lilja, for excellent technical assistance. [^1
